Traffic to Online Trading Sites Increases 30 Percent, while Blog Discussion about “Wall Street” and “Bailout” Soars, according to Nielsen Online

New York, NY – September 30, 2008 – Nielsen Online, a service of The Nielsen Company, today reported a 30 percent increase in traffic to online brokerage Web sites during the week ending Sept. 21, 2008, compared to the average category traffic for the previous seven weeks. And while online consumers discussed 401(k) plans, blog discussion about “wall street” and “bailout” soared in recent days, with nearly two percent of all blog posts on Sept. 29 mentioning “bailout” (Chart 1).

“Consumers are voicing opinions about the financial crisis – both on- and off-line. While members of congress are reporting an increase in phone calls and e-mails from constituents, many are sharing thoughts and concerns with the world online,” said Charles Buchwalter, senior vice president, research and analytics, Nielsen Online.

Traffic to the Online Trading category during the week ending Sept. 21 increased 30 percent compared to the average weekly traffic for the previous seven weeks, while the total number of people accessing the Internet remained stable. “It will be interesting to watch the traffic patterns to online trading sites over the next few months,” continued Buchwalter. “While it is gratifying to watch assets grow, investors may be less eager to routinely check their losses.”
